Beatriz has decided to kick off the tour in Mexico so the herd can take part in the annual Day of the Dead celebrations, or Día de los Muertos if you speak Spanish like the llamas do. They've arrived just in time to see an incredible street parade. The whole city has dressed up to honor their ancestors, and the costumes and giant floats look amazing.

Luis's guidebook recommends some sweets called calaveras—colorful sugar skulls—so the llamas set off into the crowd to find some.

MIAMI BEACH

Next stop is Miami, Florida. The llamas have decided to make the most of the sun and sea by hitting the beach.

It's completely packed, so Daphne and Luis head into the crowd to find a spot for their towels, while Rosa and Hector join the line for ice cream. Ricardo is keen to rent a board and join the surfers on the waves, but the llamas don't often venture down to the coast, and he's a bit nervous of the water. He's going to dip a toe in first. . .

Rosa is enjoying the abstract painting, and Carlos has discovered a passion for bronze sculptures. Beatriz and Eduardo aren't sure what to make of some of the more unusual objects on display, though.
